Q: Checking for fit I'm trying to learn by doing, which generally makes things worse, but it's currently making me worse at home-schooling. I have a teacher who says that I need to work out for at least 45 minutes a day (as opposed to 30), and that requires some kind of workout. I tried joining a gym, but I didn't last more than three weeks. So what else can I do? More fun than a gym, I find that TV, youtube and gaming are good for short periods, but that goes down for long periods. I currently home-school, and the most exercise I get is a short jog. Is there any other kind of exercise that could fill the time while I'm busy with other things? A: I'd say that a quick 5-10 minute warm-up and then a couple sets of 12 of moderately heavy/heavy repetitions (for your age) of whatever strength training exercises you've been doing would be sufficient, and does not require additional time for planning or preparation. Find an exercise that works your upper body (chest/arms/shoulders/triceps) and lower body (quadriceps/hamstrings/calves) alternately. As long as you do your warm-up, you should be ready to go within that short amount of time. General Motors (GM) is trading below its book value of $26, while Ford (F) is down close to 10 percent year-to-date as problems emerge in its massive redesign of the Ford Mustang. Tesla (TSLA) is the only stock on the S&P 500 that is trading above book value, but shares in the electric car company are worth more than $650 million, according to IPO-Kicker, because of a stock market that is attracted to the company's mission, technology and vision. "Tesla is a one-of-a-kind company. No other auto manufacturer is building cars that can roll up and out of the ground, fight off crashes with its advanced crash
